There can be few sounds more universally associated with Paris than the sprightly but wistful bal musette accordion. Between 1880 and 1960 the guinguettes (café/bar with dance hall) along the Seine or Marne rivers were the most popular places where to spend a Sunday afternoon and many famous artists started planting their easels, scribbling their poems or singing their ballads in such places. Right through the 1950s, musette accordion was the sound of popular France and although, from the 1960s onwards, rock, disco and newer dance musics marginalized the musette accordion style, it has survived remarkably well. Dozens of little regional dance groups still feature accordion tangos and javas among a cross-section of dance styles for everyone from teenagers to grand-parents at rural summer balls and weddings across the country.

Malando (real name Arie Maasland), Dutch composer & accordionist, dedicated his entire life to the Tango. Into the hundreds of Tango arrangements that he wrote, he was able to incorporate European elegance while preserving the basic Argentinean rhythms, accents and cadences of the original compositions. Even the bandoneon, an Argentinean accordion, played an important role in his arrangements
